

I am writing because I value the service offered by small internet companies such as Sonic.net, and I am concerned that as I consumer I will be limited to purchasing broadband DSL access from a very limited number of choices if Bell South is allowed to exclude small ISP's from their market. Sonic.net provides me with a level of service that is far superior to the local large phone companies, and I think the FCC should provide for small companies to retain access to telecommunications.